When one does have faith, the ills of life are infinitely easier to bear. Manifestly it had been a stretch of pride to spare the good name of the leading men and the common citizens, when the very deities did not grudge that their own reputation should be blemished. Combining the sacred grandeur of the sublime with the primitive simplicity of the frontier, it is the place where we can see the world as it really is, and so know ourselves as we really are-or ought to be. I have noticed that writers who use "suddenly" tend to exercise less control in the application of exclamation points.
